HELL, HOPE and HEROES

Life in the Field Ambulance in World War I

The Memoirs of Private Roy Ramsay AIF

Edited by his son, Ron J. Ramsay

March 2005 2005

In 1915, Private Roy Ramsay, set sail from Australia for the Middle East with the 4th Light Horse Field Ambulance. He served in Egypt and on hospital ships in the Dardanelles.

Serving with the 1st Division 3rd Field Ambulance on the Western Front, he went through Pozières and other major set-piece battles of trench warfare. Amid the hell of artillery bombardment, Roy found that both sides often exercised compassion and restraint towards the injured as well as the stretcher-bearers trying to retrieve them.

The Aussies' mateship and resourcefulness got them through the shocking physical conditions of trench warfare, helped by occasional breaks away from the lines and recreational leave for romantic purposes.

By 1918, the colonial troops had built a reputation as the best shock troops in the British army. The diggers of the greatly depleted Australian Imperial Forces, now united in one Australian Corps under General Monash, played a key role in driving the Germans back to the Hindenburg Line.
